In the beginning...there were Seven Ladies. Seven women who did not sit idly by while Savannah’s heritage was being destroyed one building at a time. And, as we all know, what began as a campaign to save one building—the Davenport House—turned into an organized movement that can take its share of credit for saving the Savannah we know and love today.

Along the way, Historic Savannah Foundation (HSF) evolved into a sophisticated and comprehensive preservation organization—one that features a first class museum, a nationally recognized revolving fund, educational programs in Savannah’s public schools, effective advocacy efforts that help protect the Landmark District from inappropriate development, and unparalleled special events for our members.

Reflecting on our origins and five decades of progress, there are four words that aptly describe what we did then and what we’re doing now:

SMART      PUBLIC      NEW      REAL

The text and images that follow in this 2013 Annual Report tell the story and depict, literally, why and how these words describe exactly what preservation is to Savannah...and what HSF should mean to you.

We’re the smartest guys in the room. Of course, we’re referring to preservationists—people who really are smart. How so? The proof is in the pudding…just take a look around this city. Were it not for visionary preservationists, we would have ruined Oglethorpe’s plan, paved through squares, traded Savannah gray brick for vinyl siding, lost hundreds of historic buildings and, in general, abandoned our heritage in the name of urban renewal and “progress.” If we had done that, would we have SCAD? Would we have progressive industries like DIRTT? Would we be the popular Condé Nast destination we are?

Be smart Savannah. Hang with HSF.
Preservation isn’t just for downtowners. And it’s not just for tourists. It’s for everyone. If you have a talent, don’t hide it away under a basket; share it. That’s pretty much what prompted HSF to get started in the first place. Our founders figured if they loved old buildings that made them feel good and affirmed a sense of place, then others probably felt the same way. Heck, if Coca-Cola could make billions selling “the real thing,” then Savannah could do the same saving authentic history. But money was not the end game. They also understood that saving heritage meant boosting civic pride and building an identity. Maybe only Don Draper was using the term “branding” in 1960s, but that’s exactly what HSF was doing for Savannah…branding it as a unique place by saving its heritage.

Today, Savannah’s brand is also its public identity. And HSF is still fighting to keep it front and center in the consciousness of City and County leaders. And we’re doing so with partners—some loyal and faithful partners like SCAD and Abshire PR as well as some new and innovative partners like Gulfstream Aerospace Corporation and Woodville-Tompkins High School, a Savannah Chatham County Public School System Title One School.

Sometimes, preservation happens in the most mundane places. If you’re not careful, you can overlook it…which is what almost happened when the old tile mosaic of Dixie Pawn Shop was slated for removal from the sidewalk in the 300 block of East Broughton Street (adjacent to the Kennedy Pharmacy). Fortunately, HSF and the City of Savannah brokered a compromise with the Boblasky family whereby the old mosaic was preserved in situ while a professional photograph was framed and presented to the owner’s descendants. When people say this town is rich in history, they mean it…it’s right under your feet!
You can’t get any more public than working with the Savannah Chatham County Public School System (SCCPSS). After rigorously working for the entire year to create a framework for our growing partnership with SCCPSS school, we are excited to announce that we kicked off our Hands on History Program at Woodville-Tompkins High School this past September. HSF is now implementing our Hands on History Program in two SCCPSS schools and we are moving full-steam ahead to continue that advancement and institute the program in other schools. The continued success of this program is due in large part to the support and underwriting of Gulfstream Aerospace Corporation and our Hands on History Camp sponsor Rives E. Worrell Construction, a JE Dunn Company.

There’s also HSF’s Preservation Festival – the ultimate celebration of preservation meant to be shared and experienced by all. This year’s festival included the participation of everyone from local students and residents to tourists and international visitors. SCCPSS students of all ages competed in our annual Pennies for Preservation Poster contest exhibited at our festival Launch Party, and students in the Culinary and Hospitality Pathways at Woodville-Tompkins High School provided catering and ushering services for the event. Hosting more than 300 guests including members of US/ICOMOS (International Council on Monuments and Sites), we happily demonstrated Savannah’s hospitality to this international constituency, and took our public celebration to a global level. Rounding out the festival with a tour, lecture and wrap party at Savannah’s very own “Pearl of Preservation,” the Davenport House, HSF is pleased to say we reached thousands of people.
Overheard in a recent conversation…
“Preservation is new.”
“Say, what?!?”
“You heard me, preservation is new.”
“How so?”

Don’t get hung up on 18th and 19th century buildings in the Landmark District as being the only things worth saving. Focus, instead, on how preservation actually brings things to life. Think about all the good infill architecture that complements our historic context. And while you’re at it, think about the Recent Past. You’re not as young as you used to be…and the buildings of your childhood may be eligible for the National Register—which means they’re worthy of preservation. So, keep an open mind. After all, Drayton Tower is now a local landmark!
Ten preservation projects were awarded HSF’s Preservation Awards this year. Two of them were compatible infill projects which were recognized for their visual compatibility and contextual sensitivity. At the ceremony, the Downtown Neighborhood Association was also recognized with the inaugural Lee & Emma Adler Award for Preservation Advocacy for their diligent work in advocating and practicing good oversight and stewardship of the Landmark District. The Nichola Parker Coe Award was also bestowed upon our hands-down, standout volunteer of the year, Mrs. Katherine Albert.

HSF understands and appreciates the value of compatible infill in the Landmark District. We see proposals every month at Historic District Board of Review meetings and our Architectural Review Committee works to ensure that new construction proposed for our community is visually compatible in height, mass, scale and materials with the surrounding historic buildings.

Savannah has also seen new neighborhoods nominated and added to the National Register of Historic Places. Many of Savannah’s first residential subdivisions, laid out in the post-World-War II era, are starting to be recognized for their break from traditional community planning, favoring curvilinear streets and cul-de-sacs; their country-living lifestyle and social organizations like neighborhood associations; and their distinctive mid-century modern architecture. Neighborhoods like Fairway Oaks-Greenview, Pine Gardens, Kensington Park-Groveland, and Magnolia Park are all taking their place in the history and evolution of Savannah’s development.
When you get down to it, preservation is the real deal. It’s certainly the ultimate recycling. Instead of tearing something down, hauling it to the landfill, using raw materials and wasting energy to create something with a limited shelf life, doesn’t it make more sense to use or adaptively use something that already exists... something with character that has stood the test of time? Even if you don’t like old buildings, you can’t argue with the economics of preservation. According to PlaceEconomics, a Washington, D.C.-based real estate and economic development consulting firm, “preserving historic buildings and sites creates jobs and increases property values.” PlaceEconomics also completed an assessment of the economic impact of historic preservation programs in Georgia and report findings show that through federal and state tax incentive programs, which encourage the rehabilitation of historic buildings, Department of Natural Resources’ Historic Preservation Division has helped contribute to the generation of 10,168 jobs and $420,046,800 in income to Georgia workers.
There are all sorts of different definitions of “stewardship.” For the past thirty years or so, preservationists have used the term as being “the careful and responsible management of an historic resource.” Environmentalists use the term as “responsible and sustainable management of natural resources.”

An earlier and more general definition involves serving or the “tasks of a domestic steward.” The etymological origin is “stig” (house or hall) and “weard” (ward, guard, guardian, or keeper). And for a while—whether you lived in a mansion or flew on an airplane—stewardship often referred to the servant’s duties for bringing food and drink to the castle’s dining hall or maybe passengers on a 747. One can suppose that all these variations—caring for resources, envisioning sustainability and providing hospitality—were on the minds of HSF’s founders as they took on their first project, saving the Davenport House.

Over the past year, the Davenport House undertook two large and several smaller projects in the ongoing maintenance and preservation of HSF’s campus. The biggest was a maintenance and landscaping initiative in the lane between the Davenport House and the Kennedy Pharmacy. No trivial matter, the Kennedy Pharmacy received a new roof. At the museum house, workers continued with an extensive and ongoing window repair and maintenance program. The smallest, though still important, was a punch list of “to do’s” for new tenants in the Kennedy Pharmacy second floor apartment.

In thinking about stewardship, the Davenport House teaches that the power of preservation can be transformational. Just as the Davenport House was transformed from blighted tenement to a beautiful house museum, this city was transformed from a moribund post World War II burg to a vibrant destination for 12 million annual visitors. In 2013, 36,000 people passed through the Davenport House and they heard about the exceptional tenacity which sparked Savannah’s historic preservation movement. That tenacity for stewardship still burns today through all aspects of HSF’s work.

At the Davenport House—just as it does for Savannah in general—hospitality and stewardship go hand-in-hand. The way we care for our historic resources and the guests who come see them will foretell their long-term preservation!

Blood is thicker than water, and it’s a blood line that is motivating Mr. Andrew Berrien Jones of New York City to restore the long-languishing Berrien House on the NW corner of Broughton and Habersham. Mr. Jones purchased HSF’s erstwhile Revolving Fund property and is undertaking a thorough and proper restoration of his ancestral home. In doing so, he is saving one of Savannah’s most important historic buildings and reviving a blighted corner in the Landmark District. The building has been lowered to its original height and the adaptive use will include commercial space on the ground floor, office space on the second floor and a private residence on the third floor. A double-stair front entry and rear galleries are being reconstructed per research and evidence in the building. There is not a firm completion date on the project, but Mr. Jones’ vision is becoming a reality.
